The article scientifically reveals and substantiates that to increase the effectiveness of spiritual education in the family, it is important and responsible to teach children from a young age important moral norms in practice - such values as justice, honesty, respect, and helping others. The role of history in educating youth is identified as the most crucial indicator.

Family is the first school and fundamental foundation of an individual's spiritual development. In the family, the child learns the first experiences of life, moral norms, and attitudes towards society. The effectiveness of national upbringing is crucial in this process, as each nation's unique cultural and moral values influence a child's personal life. National upbringing, unique national traditions, customs, values, and the specific characteristics of the education system shape an individual's inner world and social relationships. National upbringing, in turn, plays an important role in shaping the inner world and social relations of each person. National traditions, customs, and values create unique moral rules in an individual's life and help them understand their place in society. "Through national upbringing, a person learns a sense of love and respect for their high national values, which influences their spiritual development and the formation of moral feelings"[1]. For example, from a young age, children are taught national values in the family and school, undoubtedly not only the historical heritage of their nation, but also love and respect for others. In this way, the individual integrates into society and strives to maintain a balance between national and universal values. Furthermore, the education system is an integral part of national upbringing, ensuring that children understand their cultural heritage, family values, and roles in society, and that they strive for moral and spiritual perfection. Through national upbringing, individuals learn to adhere to social and moral norms and values within society and are guided towards self-determination.

Regarding national values and family upbringing, the following suggestions and recommendations can be made:

Promoting national values in the family and applying them in practice. In order to teach children national values in the family, it is important to implement the traditions and customs of society in everyday life. For example, it is important to educate children in the family with such values as love, respect, justice, and love, and to teach them to respect their history, culture, and national heritage.

Strengthening cooperation between school and family. Strengthening cooperation between school and family is important in the formation of national values. By coordinating school education and family upbringing, it is possible to achieve consistency and unity in the study of national values, historical and cultural heritage by children.

Develop modern educational methods aligned with national values. It is important to combine national values with modern education and teach children to maintain a balance between global and national values. For this, it is necessary to cover literature, art, and culture related to national values in education, as well as to integrate them with modern knowledge.

In the context of family upbringing and society. The effectiveness of national upbringing in the family helps the child clearly define their place in society. "Through national heredity, the child tries to integrate their culture and values into society. Family upbringing determines their personal attitude towards social, political, and spiritual issues in society. This depends on the moral upbringing and national values received in the family"[4]. For example, a child learns values such as justice, kindness, and joy within the family, and then adheres to these same principles in society. Spiritual education in the family serves as a fundamental force for the child in correctly understanding and implementing rights, responsibilities, and social relations in society. You can agree on the following suggestions and recommendations:

Ensure the promotion of common values in family upbringing. Family is considered the fundamental foundation in the spiritual development of the individual and their contribution to society. In family upbringing, it is necessary to highlight the importance of universal human values - kindness, respect, justice, and effectiveness. These values are formed from a young age, ensuring their development into responsible and accountable individuals who benefit society. In the family, more precisely, it is necessary to teach the child the importance of adherence to the spiritual system of society and the observance of justice and equality in various social issues.

Formation of an individual's inner maturity within the family. Family is an important factor in shaping the inner world and spiritual foundations of the individual. "To facilitate social interaction, it is essential to instill trust and sincerity in children within the family. A person raised in the family, first of all, understands themselves, feels inner autonomy and independence, and strives to integrate into society in their proper place"[4]. For this, it is important to give the child personal responsibility, sincerity, and freedom to develop their own thinking, and to approach their inner world with caution.

Creating an atmosphere of love and harmony: Creating an atmosphere of love and affection in the family serves as the basis not only for emotional stability for the child, but also for understanding and accepting true humanity in social relations. "The upbringing of love, in harmony with social relations in society, ensures that the individual is able to act on the basis of justice and humanism"[5]. In the family, it is necessary to explain to children the true essence of love, its power to unite not only family members, but also society as a whole, to teach them humanism, mutual understanding, and respect.

Maintaining a balance of values on a global and national scale: "The family, the spiritual development of the individual, and society contribute to maintaining a balance between national and global human values." In the family, it is important to approach the history and culture of the nation with respect, but at the same time, to teach them to accept global human values. By adhering to national values, the individual ensures unity in society's striving for an honest approach to universal human and humanitarian problems.

Conclusion Ensuring the effectiveness of family upbringing plays a crucial role in shaping a person's moral qualities: firstly, promoting national values within the family (teaching children about national values, customs, and culture within the family, and implementing them in life) can contribute to the development of a person's moral qualities. This teaches the child to treat their history and culture with respect; secondly, strengthening moral norms in the family (the family develops their spiritual maturity by applying moral norms such as justice, love, and honesty to the child in their life. With the help of exemplary relationships of family members, the moral and social activity of the individual is formed;
